Themes for the Symposium

The symposium and the associated publication is intended for artists, scientists and researchers who are interested in the following subjects:

1. (Environmental) Art & Aesthetics – A Dialogue Between the Pristine and the Constructed

Contemporary artistic practice, in whatever time and place it happens, is always in dialogue with pre-existing aesthetic judgements. What forms does this constant but often unnoticed traffic between practice and abstraction take in environmental art, and how does it help us reflect on our changing world?

What are the underlying characteristics of natural, cultural, or built environments, and how do these spaces relate to the concept of pristine nature? What role does aesthetics have in creating and maintaining the shifting boundaries between these layers of constructed space and unsullied nature? What narratives do these works create? How can these kinds of works influence larger societal discourse? Can they even, for example, impact at the practical level of city planning?

2. (Environmental) Art & Politics – What is Art's Responsibility and Sphere of Influence?

The proper relationship between art on the one hand and society and politics on the other is a very old question indeed. In environmental art today the question is more acute than ever: how can, should and do practicing artists join the dialogue about how to change our opinions and decision making?

Clashes over ecological issues, land use and the crisis of democracy are increasingly creating conflicts. What are some of the underlying causes of these conflicts, and how could (environmental) art dissect and explain not only what is happening, but also why and what it means for society? Can art present solutions and does it need to? Who has rights to cities or to the (natural) environment? Can art be activism and how

3. (Environmental) Art & Science – Exploring Methods for New Collaboration

Both science and art are modes of enquiry, promoting human curiosity and learning, yet the dialogue between scientists and artists has long been a difficult one. Are we perhaps entering a stage where this situation might be changing?

How can scientists make their work heard and relevant to diverse audiences through storytelling and art? Should art make science more understandable or visible? Is that the role of art? How could artists and scientists work together creating new ideas, solutions or even utopias?

About Vartiosaari

The main symposium venue is a unique island called Vartiosaari located in eastern archipelago of Helsinki. The island has high landscape and biodiversity value, and it is among the nationally distinguished environments in Finland. The journey to the island is by boat only.

The island has several villas and vacation homes, but only around 20 permanent residents. Read more on the city of Helsinki's official website and a Vartiosaari Association website (only in Finnish). The city of Helsinki plans to link the island to the mainland and build new urban infrastructure and housing for up to 7000 new inhabitants. The symposium-project supports preserving Vartiosaari as a recreational area.

LARU ART

The main organizational body behind the project is LARU ART Association, an artist-driven non-profit organisation based in Helsinki. In operation since 2005, LARU ART produces international environmental art events in which both media art and performance art are prominently featured. The symposium is organised in collaboration with Arts Promotion Centre Finland. Full list of collaborators and supporters are on the Symposium website.
